TEACHING AND CURRICULUM DEVELOPMENT AT THE UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Extension Teaching

Program Development

Building Extension’s Public Value (BEPV): I created this workshop to teach anyone who develops, delivers, evaluates, or advocates for Extension programs how to make a case for public funding by communicating their programs’ public value to key stakeholders. Rooted in public sector economics, the program content develops the idea that Extension programs create public value when they effectively address market failure. Workshop participants identify a program’s stakeholders, determine how the program addresses one or more types of market failure, and evaluate Extension’s comparative strengths in delivering the program. Participants draft a message about their program’s public value that highlights the program’s documented impacts and outcomes. I am the principal author of the curriculum, which consists of a participant workbook, presenter’s guide, and Powerpoint™ slides. Each of the eleven workshop modules includes activities designed to achieve specific learning objectives. A workshop may span three to six hours, depending on the modules taught. I have won two national awards for the BEPV workshop, which I have taught to Extension organizations in at least 17 states and one Canadian province.

- Among respondents to a 2008 BEPV trainee survey, 83% reported that the public value approach had influenced the way their organization communicates with stakeholders; 84% reported that the public value approach had positively affected their own work; 69% reported a positive impact on stakeholders’ views of their organization; and 64% reported a positive impact on stakeholders’ views of their programs. More program impacts are reported in Kalambokidis, Laura. “Spreading the Word about Extension’s Public Value.” Journal of Extension 49, 2 (April 2011). <http://www.joe.org/joe/2011april/a1.php>.
- Of respondents to end-of-workshop surveys from nine BEPV workshops over 2009-2012, 88 percent reported that they can apply the skills or ideas they learned to their organization. Among respondents to pre-post evaluations from six workshops over 2009-12, the average level of knowledge of the public value of Extension programs increased from 2.98 to 4.26 on a 5-point Likert scale.

- An hour-long webinar describing the program and summarizing its content is here: <https://connect.msu.edu/p13999648>.
- Program updates are on the BEPV blog: <http://publicvalue.cfans.umn.edu/>.

Building Extension's Public Value Train-the-Trainer course: I created this live, online webinar to increase Extension organizations' capacity to conduct public value trainings of their own. After registering and paying a fee, participants in the four-hour course learn how to teach BEPV workshops to Extension staff in their own states. The curriculum is the same as for the BEPV workshop, plus an archived recording of the webinar for participants to reference after the course. Following the most recent course, 91 percent of trainees responding to a participant survey reported more skill in explaining the public value of their programs, and 76 percent reported that they are now prepared to conduct workshops of their own.

Public Value of Public Programs (PVPP): I developed this adaptation of the BEPV workshop to teach non-profit and local government providers of outreach programs how to make a case for public funding by communicating their programs' public value to key stakeholders. I am the author of the curriculum, which consists of a participant workbook, presenter's guide, and Powerpoint™ slides. I trained University of Minnesota Community Economics Extension Educators to teach this face-to-face workshop to non-profit and local government audiences across Minnesota. Following recent workshops, 99 percent of respondents to participant surveys reported increased knowledge.

Who Pays Taxes? (Why Civilized Societies Pay Taxes): I created this one-hour presentation to prepare Minnesota civic groups for constructive discussions about the role and size of government and how to fund government activities. The content, based in public sector economics, includes market failure, the role of different levels of government, the principles of tax policy, and the distribution of income and taxes in the United States and in Minnesota. Following the most recent presentation, 83 percent of respondents to a participant survey reported they were satisfied or very satisfied with the presentation.

Minnesota's Approach to Business Taxation: The objective of this one-hour presentation is to inform civic groups about current issues in business taxation in Minnesota. I am the author of the presentation content, which includes the principles of business tax policy, how Minnesota taxes businesses, and developments to watch for in state business taxation.

Current Issues in Minnesota Tax Policy: The objective of this one-hour presentation is to prepare Economics school teachers and civic groups for constructive discussions about tax reform options in Minnesota. I am the author of the presentation content, which includes an economics-based approach to evaluating tax reform proposals, a description of Minnesota's state budget challenges, and developments to watch for in state tax policy.
